which was otherwise in normal use, to feed our demagnetising coil.

Since the field is strongest inside the coil, we provide space there to take the parts with which we wish to deal. The writer has frequently used an old 100-turn plug-in tuning-coil from an old-fashioned type of wireless set, to produce the field required. But for those who wish to make up proper and permanent equipment, Fig. 531 gives constructional details of a practical and inexpensive coil for 4-6 volts. The "bobbin" or former is made from thin wood—plywood scraps are very suitable—and is either glued together, or secured with brass pins. It will be seen from the drawing that it uses two cheeks or plates each 2 in. by 4 in., and two pieces each 2½ in. by 1½ in.

It is wound with double-cotton-covered copper wire, No. 24 s.w.g., which is 0.02 in. dia. About 140 yds. are required, and this has a weight of 0.7 pound. In practice, ½ lb. is wound on to the bobbin and the resistance comes out at a shade over 9Ω so that it passes about 0.5 amp. at 4.5 volts; and about 0.675 amp. at 6 volts. Any transformer which can provide 1 amp. even for short periods will suffice. The bobbin may be fed at 8 or 12 volts for a minute or so at a time, which will give an even stronger field, and it will be seen, later, that a matter of a minute or so at a time is all that is needed. The cost of the energy used is too small to be worth working out. Wind on the wire evenly, leaving 2 in. sticking out through the commencing hole. About 60 turns will go to the layer, and the total number of layers is less than ten. Keep the turns tight. At the end of the wind, bring it out through the second small hole. If desired, the whole bobbin and winding may be impregnated with shellac-varnish (shell-lac dissolved in methylated spirit to the consistency of milk), but in

Fig. 531. The bobbin for a demagnetising coil: plywood or thin oak is very suitable material. All dimensions in inches. Glue together, or assemble with brass pins. A suitable base-plate of similar material may be fitted, after winding.
